

A Terrible Logic

A divorced father named Bill Smith with four young daughters agonizes over his situation -- which he considers maddeningly unfair. He feels victimized by his ex-wife Ann and a courthouse gang of judges and social workers. He refers to the judges as clowns in black robes. What he wants is something impossible -- to be left alone to raise his girls. Above all, Smith is bedeviled by an intense belief that the main obstacle to a happy and productive future for the girls he adores is their mother, as well as her lifestyle and close friends. On a rainy and chilly night in March while sitting alone at the kitchen table in his home up a canyon in the tree fruit country of central Washington, Smith resolves his problem. He decides, reluctantly, on a solution and a course of action -- not forced by anger, jealousy, betrayal or madness, he says, but by love.
